Environmental impact assessment is now well accepted as a requirement for all major projects and a significant body of expertise has built up around preparing and assessing Environmental Impact Statements. But times are changing in the world of projects. Projects are larger than ever before, with more components and complexity. The scale & intensity of development seems to be increasing exponentially and the time frames are ever squeezed.

How are our EIA processes and people coping with this? Certainly, EISs are getting larger and larger, and so are the lists of approval conditions. But are we really getting the outcomes we seek from the EIA process? Project specific EIA has a number of limitations. Are the cracks showing?

This presentation will reflect on the state of environmental impact assessment in Queensland and whether the processes and products are achieving the desired outcome – a balance of sustainability & development. It will discuss some limitations of project specific EIA & explore the interplay between EIA, strategic environmental assessment and cumulative impacts.
